WATER COLORS BY WINSLOW HOMER AND JOHN SINGER SARGENT

JANUARY, 1918

When the history of American painting has been written for all time, two names will stand out prominently among the most important artists that this country has ever produced. They are Winslow Homer and John Sargent. The first of these men was born in Boston and was almost entirely self-taught. He became a lithographer and then Harpers' correspondent at the front during the early years of the Civil War. From this he developed into the foremost American marine painter. Later he took up the more summary medium of water color, working broadly for effects of light and color.

John Sargent was born of American parents in Florence, received his first training in the Academy there, and later was a student under Carolus-Duran. From this training he emerged a most facile portrait painter, being considered by eminent authorities the first portraitist since Reyno'ds and Gainsborough. After he had acquired fame and fortune in this branch of oil painting, he gave it up for water color, with the interesting results here shown.

This exhibition is especially remarkable because it brings to us unfamiliar work by familiar masters. All lovers of art are well acquainted with oil paintings by both artists but many of them have never had such an excellent opportunity to view and study their work in another medium.

PAINTINGS BY ELIZABETH W. ROBERTS

---

In Gallery IV hangs a group of paintings by Elizabeth W. Roberts. They bear no titles, and no numbers. They are all studies made in New England on the beaches of Cape Ann. Though they are all of the same subject, the opportunity for variation is as great as though no one theme were related to another. The ever-changing sea presents each moment a new aspect of form, light, and color. Second only to the sea in possibilities is the shore, and so these Figures on the Sand are far removed from monotony.

In writing of her own work Miss Roberts says:

"I paint the day and the hour as I find it, and am much interested in experimenting with benzine as a medium. This treatment approaches water color, as used with body color. The benzine also absorbs a certain amount of the oil, leaving the colors in all their purity and brilliancy as when mixed with tempera."

The pupil while in Paris of Bouguereau, Robert-Fleury, and Lefebvre, she has traveled far from their academic art into a style all her own. She has received honorable mention at the Paris Salon and is represented in public galleries abroad as well as in this country.

An enthusiastic war worker, she has placed these paintings on sale at $500 each, the proceeds to go to the Red Cross and to the relief of French Soldier-Artists and their families. In this way she has raised about seven thousand dollars.

SCULPTURE BY GERTRUDE V. WHITNEY

FEBRUARY, 1918

It is rare that patron and artist combine in one person. Mrs. Whitney, who is active in many fields other than art, has made an enviable reputation for herself as a sculptor, having received, in addition to numerous other awards, honorable mention at the Paris Salon of 1912 and a bronze medal at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. She has done much for the younger artists of New York, opening her studio for exhibitions, and encouraging them in many other ways.
